More Airline News

This week's newsletter starts with more news from United Airlines. United Airlines implemented notable changes to its baggage policy, continuing a broader industry trend of increasing fees.

As of today, the airline raised checked baggage fees by approximately $10 for the first and second bags on most domestic and short-haul international routes, including travel within the U.S., Mexico, Canada, and parts of Latin America. This brings the typical cost to around $45 for the first checked bag and $55 for the second when prepaid, with even higher fees if added closer to departure. Additionally, the fee for a third checked bag saw a sharper increase, rising to about $200.

These changes are largely driven by rising operational costs—particularly a sharp increase in jet fuel prices tied to global geopolitical tensions. Baggage fees remain a critical revenue stream for airlines, allowing them to offset expenses without significantly raising base airfare, which is more heavily taxed.

While the higher fees impact many travelers, certain passengers—including those with elite status, co-branded credit cards, or premium cabin tickets—can still receive complimentary checked bags.

For travelers, the takeaway is clear: baggage strategy matters more than ever. Prepaying for luggage, packing lighter, or leveraging airline perks can make a meaningful difference in overall trip cost. As airlines continue to adjust pricing structures, understanding these policies upfront is key to avoiding unexpected expenses and maximizing travel value.
